Leah practices in the area of workers' compensation defense, representing a variety of large and small businesses. With more than 20 years of experience in workers' compensation litigation, she understands the needs of her clients, often delivering cost-effective, early resolution to matters.

Part of the value Leah provides to her clients includes training and education to help them reduce and mitigate risk for themselves and their employees. She is also a frequent speaker on workers' compensation issues at seminars around the country.

Leah is a certified workers' compensation mediator for the Oklahoma Workers' Compensation Court of Existing Claims, as well as an arbitrator for the Cherokee Nation.

Leah, recognized for her skill and experience in 2013 by SuperLawyers, earned her law degree from the University of Tulsa, where she was on the law review. She received her undergraduate degree in accounting from Northeastern State University. Leah has served on the board of directors for the Oklahoma Self-Insured Association and is a Patron of the Tulsa Ballet.
