In modern history, there has not been a more disruptive risk management event than the COVID-19 pandemic. It has changed everything, including how we work, where we work and how we interact with each other. Every industry, business and individual has been impacted in numerous ways, which remains fluid as the world continues to face related evolving challenges. This novel virus did not come with a playbook, but after months of living through it, there are many lessons that we can derive from those in our industry who had to quickly adjust and adapt their business models.

In this “Out Front Ideas with Kimberly and Mark” industry keynote session, Kimberly George and Mark Walls lead a diverse group of panelists in a discussion on how their businesses were impacted by COVID-19 and, in response, how they have modified their way of doing business. Learn how they overcame some of their largest challenges, what lessons they learned along the way, and how they expect their businesses, and the workers’ compensation industry as a whole, will have to evolve moving forward.

Learning Objectives:

1. Learn how COVID19 impacted various segments of the workers’ compensation industry.
2. Learn how businesses are adapting to the challenges presented in a pandemic.
3. Learn how businesses are changing their business models due to the pandemic.

Medicare requires WC plans to report both the Medicare status of claimants and any settlements or judgments for claimants who are Medicare beneficiaries. Failure to report could one day lead to fines up to $1,000 per day, per claim. And we know that Medicare is currently exploring the details of how to start these penalties. Presenters will discuss the status of Medicare's progress, share informed predictions on the shape these penalties may take, and go over best practice recommendations that front-line adjusters can use to go on the offensive today, to head off any penalty concerns for non-compliance.

Presumption laws -- embracing more conditions -- now are ubiquitous: is science, or sympathy, leading the charge? Should we legislate liability both without fault, and now in some cases also without (scientific basis for) causation? What about similar risks and exposures for workers not favored by presumptions. Are we approaching an 'equal protection' day of reckoning?

In their analysis of selected state statutes, our panel gives a realistic assessment of whether some states' measures for rebutting presumptions are in practical effect illusory, thus increasing already questionable financial burdens on impacted employers, and whether, in the panelists' views, some states have gotten the mix just right.

Our national panel tackles this often fraught subject from all sides: bench, bar, physician and claims, via thought provoking presentation designed to shed light and facilitate debate for the benefit all interested stakeholders.

While claims professionals are facing a constant evolution as to how COVID-19 challenges are affecting their handling obligations, there is a concurrent evolution as to “creative” discovery and litigation tactics which need to be acknowledged and understood. Aggressive litigation tactics are getting more prevalent. As this panel of experts addresses an adjuster’s ethical obligations, they will concurrently walk the “path of fee resistance” in exhibiting how ethical compliance can support employer/carrier’s denial of attorney fee entitlement, while ethically providing a complete investigation and provision of benefits potentially due.
